The protease-susceptibility of several hydrogel systems, having a broad range of physicochemical properties, were investigated in vitro by estimating the intrinsic fluorescence of human red blood cells (RBC) trapped in their interior. The in vitro degradation was followed after exposure to gamma-glutamyl-peptidase (exocytosed in liver tumors) or urokinase plasminogen activator (secreted by tumor cells). The efficacy of complete protease inactivation was demonstrated for a conventional, time-dependent, thermal gelation protocol involving radical polymerization of n-isopropylacrylamide monomer. The extent of protease accessibility exhibited a clear correlation with the physicochemical properties of the hydrogel matrix: hydrogels that self-rearrange through thermoreversible gel-sol transition at physiological temperatures, but have an extensive distribution of pores of molecular size greater than 2 microns, were least susceptible to proteolytic degradation. The efficacy of complete protease inactivation varied in this same order, with the most accessible gel exhibiting 90% inactivation at 2 h. Exposure to gamma-glutamyl-peptidase in vitro degrades these gels in an essentially f678ea9f9e
